It may take some digging through the chain of command to find the right person to talk to, but credibility is very important; it can make or break your article or news report. Those in the know understand; the rest do not. A blog about delivering information—by the truckload. It sets the mood for the stories. All in all, using quotes in an article depends on the story. It's a story that you would hear in the news but has quite a few twists and turns, but time to end it. Even when information from a source is not used in a direct quote and is paraphrased instead, it still must be attributed to that source. Every word must be understood by the ordinary reader, every sentence must be clear at one glance, and every story must say something about people. Take classes on journalism to learn...not necessarily only how to write but how to think. Journalism is a loaded topic but there are some basic principles to adhere to.
