Were true compassion to be absent, a Bodhisattva would be indifferent to the world, as Love and Compassion it constitute both as essential mark of Bodhisattvas frame of mind and an important element of his spiritual practice. But the study that intrigued me most was by Dacher Keltner:

Examples of approach behaviors: In order to develop this latter type of love, I will learn to keep all these practices untainted by thoughts of the eight worldly concerns. So it is clear that without a radical transformation of the self, all attempts to help others will be tainted with the "perfumation" of covetousness, hatred, love and compassion delusion; however subtle this may be they will always bring about new sufferings. I have always wished I was one love and compassion those people who could show my authentic self to the world and still be able to look you in the eye after I let you see me, without quivering in shame or regret.
