Marshall argues that Christians don't posit their 'own' truth or their 'own form' of truth. Second, he is not uncritical of Davidson's coherence theory. Through its discussion of abuse and the holocaust, an engagement with Augustine, original sin and feminism, a fresh and sometimes surprising perspective is offered, both on the theology of sin and on the pathologies under consideration.

In either case it will be challenging and great fun to think through these issues. Marshall begins with the claim that, for the church as for any other community, there are central identity-constituting claims, claims which if no longer made would effectively bring to an end the community in question. An earlier reviewer is correct to say that Marshall relies on the work of Davidson without looking at MacIntyre's critiques but I'm not sure that it's as devastating to his argument on a whole as the reviewer would imply. This book reveals the secret sauce.
