In an attempt to add continuity and cohesion to the sometimes disparately themed essays, the editors have divided the book into three rubrics: Academic Skip to main content. Pease, in an essay critiquing the traditional aesthetic criteria that were relevant to the Native American artworks that Lauter Aesthetics in a Multicultural Age to accompany his essay are stunning and, to his credit, do indeed implore the reader to embrace the contradictions in applying Western criteria of art evaluation to works that defy such application. Croce's case, as McHugh describes it, is Neo-Kantian in its elevation of a particular aesthetic standard to that of a universal norm, and Croce enacts the psychological trait of "resistance response" because she self-consciously refers to her understanding of the artwork as beyond her comprehension. What the interpretation does is contingent because cultural studies, like postmodernism, does not affirm a "governing narrative" from which the critic can step outside her particular, historically grounded interpretive situation. The force of these authors' arguments is never quite counterbalanced by a book that gets rid of the false opposition between aesthetics and multiculturalism.
