The stories related in messenger scenes were popular with audiences, and found their way as scenes depicted on thousands of vases produced in Greece or its colonies during those times. In Rhesus in contrast, the charioteer who reports the death of the hero is so personally involved that his report is inadequate. What and how a narrator knows, and consequently how she or he is able to provide the account offered, is therefore central to all narrative. As a messenger, as I. His attentive readings of a range of plays—from Persians to Rhesos—convincingly back up his claim that messengers raise fundamental questions about knowledge and authority.

Epistemology and Tragic Practice Appendix:

This figure's performance appears to contradict my argument at nearly every important point, the rich rhetorical and discursive experimentation of tragedy asks to be viewed against its reliance upon an authoritative "epic" voice and against the genre's own commentary on this reliance. In Antigone the guard's report at 1051-1055 defines precisely the distinction between what he has seen—the traces of the burial and what he did not see—the action; the messenger in OC does not see what finally happened to Oedipus, though he enumerates what did not.
