The shafts in the Queen's Chamber were explored in by the German engineer Rudolf Gantenbrink using a crawler robot he designed, Upuaut 2. Proctor, while admitting the existence of many of the curious coincidences on which the theory of the inspired origin of the Great.

At first, the burial chamber was to be placed deep underground, with a descending passage leading to it. The eternal royal abode. Two successive intended burial chambers were constructed in the body of the pyramid, the final one lying at the end of an impressive corbel-roofed passage, which seems originally to have been intended simply as a storage-place for the plug-blocks of stone that were made to slide down to block access to the upper chambers after the burial. Proctor refers to "the multitude of relations, independent of the pyramid, which have turned up while Pyramidologists have been endeavouring to connect the pyramid with the solar.
