Daniel Goleman wants to learn how some sunscreens have chemicals that turn to carcinogens when exposed to the sun? I really liked the treatment of incremental improvements: So, Ecological Intelligence is a good theme for the broader environmental movement and environmentally-minded people should build on this aptly-named theme to broaden the discussion to include the social institutions that matter just as much as the consumer-to-business relationship. The true impacts of what we buy have been ignored for the majority of goods. Although a little redundant at times, Goleman presents critical information and ideas about how we can start moving toward a less toxic, more sustainable world. How would you answer that question? Knowing that metric about a TV set or box of aluminum foil, I reasoned, we could take more responsibility for the impact on the planet of our individual choices.

Unbound Worlds Exploring the science fiction and fantasy universe. The idea writes about other people's findings and solutions, yet says that he came up with the label "ecological intelligence". Write a position paper either supporting or disputing the value of this principle as policy.
