Retrieved 10 March The EFV also experienced significant problems in September and October with the bow flap—a folding panel extended forward to generate additional hydrodynamic lift as the EFV moves through the water. Retrieved 6 January The Marines contend that the EFV would have to be totally redesigned at great cost. Other Members have also suggested that the EFV cancellation would lead to eliminating hundreds of high-skilled manufacturing jobs as well as hurting local economies in states and districts associated with the EFV program. If the Marines need armored fighting vehicles in the early stages of an amphibious landing, these vehicles must either be transported by landing craft with limited protection against enemy fire, or the armored vehicle must come ashore under its own power. One example of such lack of protection is the Hezbollah C cruise missile attack against an Israeli ship where two missiles were fired, with one hitting the Israeli warship, which was about 10 miles from shore, and the second missile striking an Egyptian ship 36 miles from shore. Hunter a member of the House Armed Services Committee anticipated the cancellation of the contract was awarded to General Dynamics Land Systems to begin full-scale engineering development of their design.
